Not illustrated. 1899 Excerpt: .a regular patient and one that I had seen at least twice in hysterical convulsions. On arriving I was informed that she had suffered one of her old fits, but as she was then bright and natural I was in no sense disturbed by this fact. She complained bitterly of the pain in her stomach and said it was associated with general abdominal pain and diarrhea. Upon examining the abdomen, the pregnant uterus was discovered and the fact elicited that her pregnancy was about seven months advanced. There was at this time no edema of the face, hands or feet, and according to her own statement she had passed an abundant quantity of urine. She attributed the abdominal pain to an indiscretion in diet of which she was aware, and treatment was directed accordingly. Soon after leaving the house there was a recurrence of the convulsions more severe than before, and upon my return I succeeded in procuring enough urine to test by the homely method of boiling in a spoon over an ordinary lamp, when the diagnosis was soon made. The convulsions were now recurring rapidly and she was given one-half grain of morphin hypodermically, and as the pulse was full and bounding, she was bled until it became soft. Every effort was made to excite cutaneous function by hot packs, but owing to the restlessness of the patient this was not successful. Within half an hour after the bleeding, consciousness returned, and one drop...
