This was the first word that occurred to me with the last sentence of the book. Redemption for what we've done; redemption from what we've suffered. .a touching story of two people struggling to find their place in life and their true self, two souls which have suffered more than enough, two human beings who have discovered that we are the loneliest in our darkest hours. Tsvetalina Baykusheva PUBLISHER'S NOTE: Previously released in 2013 as The Lone Wolf. [Literary, Women's Fiction, Contemporary] When her husband David's infidelities are revealed, shattering the perfect life Kasey Sanford thought they'd created together, it's a wake-up call that she's lost herself along the way. She demands that David move with her to a new town, to a fresh start for their life together. Kasey loves the freedom of reinventing herself, including her new friendship with police officer and soldier Andrew Adams. Intent on preserving her marriage for the sake of her young daughter, and with no one else to confide in, Kasey turns to Andrew for support. But Andrew's own life is falling apart as he's put on standby for another deployment, triggering painful memories he'd rather ignore. He'll do anything to forget the soldiers who didn't return home with him, his stillborn son, and all those he's disappointed, including God. As their relationship grows, Kasey must decide if she will repair her marriage and remain with the man she...
