Not illustrated. 1860 Excerpt: .irritation seemed to have extended from this, and to have produced the suppuration in the prostate. The frequency of abscess in the enlarged gland is in the proportion of five in thirty-five; in the non-enlarged, two in sixty-five. The principal facts connected with these cases may perhaps be best seen by the following table: Abscess in the prostate does not generally attain any great size. Although both lateral lobes are sometimes found quite excavated by suppuration, yet the capsule of the prostate, and the structure of the gland itself, offer such opposition to extension, that the pus generally soon makes its way into the urethra, by one or more openings, most frequently in the neighbourhood of the veru montanum. Tubercle. Tubercle is the only other abnormal affection of the prostate, giving rise to enlargement, which I have noticed; and that only in one case. The patient..
