Not illustrated. 1889 Excerpt: .of this vault correspond to the oral plates of the Neocrinoids. One of these is larger than the rest, and immediately behind it the vault is perforated by a single, excentric, or, rarely, central aperture, which is often prolonged into a tubular proboscis, and which is to be regarded as the anus. In all such cases, the ambulacral grooves are continued beneath the above-mentioned canopy, from the bases of the arms, across the ventral aspect calyx, as so many tunnels. During life these lodged both the l grooves and the water-vessels beneath them, and there is aid that the latter opened into a circular vessel surrounding the and representing the circular ambulacral vessel of the Echino generally. Hence in specimens of such forms, where the armsl been detached (figs. 294-296), the upper side of the calyx is i to be covered with a plated dome, and the points of insertion of the arms are marked by the openings of the food-grooves on their my inwards to the concealed mouth. In the great family of the Cyathocrinidtz, among the P; crinoids, the mouth and convergent food-grooves are corn from view by a vault which is chiefly composed of the oral plates in the centre, together with the united covering-plates of the ambulacra (fig. 297, A). These are all of a much less missive character than in the forms above mentioned, and are readily destroyed. When these tegminal plates have not been preserved--as is very commonly the case--then...
